Heart of Darkness - JSTOR

Heart of Darkness TODAY MANY students of history, as well as of literature, read the novel Joseph Conrad set in the Congo of 1890. In our era of decolonization, they are interested because the story is one of fiction's strongest statements about imperialism. Of course, the novel has other important themes, both psychological and metaphysical.

colonization of Africa as seen in Conrad's The Heart of Darkness. Just beyond the "biggest and greatest town on earth", four men sit patiently on their boat, waiting for the serene waters of the Thames to ebb (65). One of the men, a Buddha, breaks the silence, saying, "and this also...has been one of the dark places of the earth" (67).

Heart of Darkness inscribes a European view of Africa, this should encourage rather than preclude an "African" reading of the text. Indeed Achebe's own fiction, not least among the African "replies" to Heart of Darkness, has made a purely metropolitan reading of the text an extremely impoverished one.
